A recent study suggests that there are direct effects of the parathyroid hormone (PTH) receptor on chondrocyte matrix synthesis. To examine this issue more closely, the effects of PTH on growth plate chondrocyte synthesis of proteoglycans, type II collagen, and endothelin were studied. PTH decreased proteoglycan synthesis (by 60% in 10 min) in a dose-related fashion, but the subsequent effects on type II collagen and endothelin production were small. In addition, perichondrium from parathyroidectomized mice produced significantly less of these three proteins than did the perichondrium of sham-operated animals. Thus, PTH is a potent stimulus to chondrocyte synthesis of proteoglycans, but effects on collagen and endothelin appear to be direct. The effects of PTH on bone formation may be mediated by chondrocytes. It is well known that both individuals and other living organisms can become ill when they inhale particles such as pollen, fungi, bacteria and/or other air-borne substances. The vast majority of these particles are carried into the nose and through the upper respiratory system, and all of them cause a host of symptoms that include: headache, sneezing, aching and stuffy, swollen, watery, or blocked nasal passages. While many people can get over these kinds of symptoms with time, it is not always clear how they will improve with time, and others may find that they are infrequently plagued by them. Sometimes the cause of the nuisance and misery is more than pollen. For example, all pollen counts may be high, but 50b96ab0b6
